Alleby and the Forty Thieves

Old Alleby was sure he could give the Forty Gang pointers on being tough any day but he couldn't catch up with them until the mysterious "green mist" took a hand.

Another AMAZING-MAN Adventure

By Duke Carey

AMAN, the Amazing-Man had been in Steelville three days, which was a long time for that young crime-fighter to stay in any one place. He had made one friend during his stay, old George Alleby, the cop who patrolled the tough district around the water front.

Old Alleby loved to tell stories of his youthful adventures on the water front which had been, if possible even tougher than it was now. Aman had listened to him for an hour on the two preceding evenings, so he sought him out again at this particularly dull hour.

As he approached the old man on his beat he saw that something was wrong. There was no spring in the policeman's step and the glint had gone from his steel-grey eyes.

"Trouble?" Aman asked in a kindly voice.

"Bad trouble," Alleby admitted. "I've patrolled this district since I was kid of twenty-two and now the chief says I'm too old for the job. He's shipping me out in the suburbs to play house maid to the kiddies on their scooters."

"That will be easier," Aman suggested tactfully.

"Easy!" old George snorted. "I don't want anything easy. I'm still a good policeman, able to fight the worst of them. Nurse, maid—bah!"

AMAN smiled, but was careful not to let old George see the smile. He knew that Alleby was a bit too old for so tough a beat, but he had heard enough to know that he was still feared and respected by most of the neighborhood.

"It's that Forty Gang, as they call themselves," Alleby explained. "If they'd stand and fight I could handle them, but they're young, slick, thieving devils! You know, Mr. Aman, I never was a killing copy. These kids are merely sneak-thieves. They should be in jail, and I manage to keep some of them there most of the time, but I can't shoot to kill, even when they run from me."

"When do you get transferred?" Aman asked casually.

"Tomorrow night," Old George's voice was bitter.

"I've got to be going," the Amazing Man said, and told Alleyby goodnight. He had a plan to help the old man if possible.

Aman knew the type of which the "Forty Gang" consisted, and was really sorry for them. Misguided youths, not vicious, but lazy and too likely to think crime, even petty crime, more romantic than work.

He was sure the five youths he passed in front of the cigar store were a part of the gang. He hesitated, went back to the cigar store and bought a pack of cigarettes—which he never smoked, then paused in the doorway to listen.

"It's old George's last night on the water front," a pale youth with a cigarette hanging from his drooping lower lip said, "Let's give him the works." The five boys at once entered into enthusiastic plans, not suspecting that the man who stood in the doorway had ears that were trained to catch minute sounds at long distances.

IT was dark on the water front when Aman swam through the brackish water to the big warehouse dock an hour later. He knew that the "Forty Gang" intended to pry open a door and steal several cases of eggs out of this particular building. Also, he had tipped old George off by phone in a changed voice that the boys would be working in that neighborhood. He knew the old policeman would be too proud to ask headquarters for help, that he would come alone.

He heard subdued whispers in the warehouse as he came out of the water and climbed to the dock. He waited until his keen ears caught the sound of old George's heels on the cobblestone street in front of the warehouse, then gave a shrill whistle.

DARK forms swarmed out of the warehouse, yelled at old George derisively and ran down an alley between other warehouses and the wharfs.

But they didn't get far. Even as he whistled, Aman was disappearing into the green mist, and the mist hurtled with lightning speed ahead of the fleeing thieves.

The pale light from a distant street lamp barely showed the forms of the fleeing culprits, certainly it didn't show the outline of that green mist.

"Come on, Gang!" the lanky youth Aman had noted earlier that evening cried out, then stopped short. "Oomph!" Something had struck him in the chest with a sickening jolt.

"What th—?" Another youth doubled up from a blow, coming from some unseen point. Old George was breathing raspingly as he clogged along toward the halted gang, hoping to get in at least one good, disciplining blow at one of his tormentors.

Each time one of the thieves started away from where George was coming up, that mysterious, sickening blow caught him and doubled him up. Then old George went into action.

"You kids gotta stop this stealing," he admonished, even as he delivered blows right and left. "You'll be hung or in the pen if somebody don't teach you some sense!"

THE "Forty Gang" never quite knew what happened that night. Aman, enveloped in that mist and invisible himself, darted around the edges of the milling group, like a sheep dog keeping a flock together. Every time one of the boys went outside the circle he was stopped by those mysterious blows.

It was too much. They were too frightened to put up a fight against old George, and the policeman was leaving the time of his life. He couldn't see the Green Mist, he only knew that at last he was within fighting distance of the Forty Gang, and was teaching its members the lesson of their young lives.

The fight was over all too soon for old George. The five youths who remained standing gave up all at once. "You win, George," the lanky youth said, his hands in the air.

"Say 'Sir' to your betters," the old man commanded, and the cowed youth amended, "You win, sir." Not until then did old George walk over to a phone box on a corner of the nearest warehouse and call for the patrol wagon.

AMAN met old George the next evening, noted that the spring was back in his step, and that a triumphant smile lighted up his old eyes. "Heard you broke up the Forty Gang," he said to the policeman.

"Yep, and I'm staying on this beat," old George said. "My son, who's an athletic instructor, is helping me organize them into a club." Then he added, "You know, Mr. Aman, I kind of like those kids."

Aman only smiled. What he knew, he would keep to himself.

AMAZING MEN

of AVIATION

by JOSEPH A. KALIFF

NEARLY five centuries ago Leonardo da Vinci after observing hundreds of birds in flight from the picturesque hills near Florence, Italy, and studying wing structure and body control, designed what was to be the forerunner of modern aircraft, unknowingly utilizing fundamental principles of present aircraft construction.

EVEN long before da Vinci was born, we had in Greek mythology the story of Daedalus and his son Icarus who succeeded in propelling themselves through the air by means of wings secured to the body with wax. But this experiment proved fatal to Icarus because in his exhilaration he flew too close to the sun which melted the wax permitting his wings to drop off and him to be drowned in the sea.

THE first machine to actually fly was built by John Stringfellow about the year 1860. Three pioneers in aeronautics, Sir Hiram Maxim of England, Professor S. P. Langley of the United States and Otto Lilienthal of Germany immediately began experiments based upon his principles.

Lilienthal made many successful glider flights between 1890 and 1896. The glider is similar in construction to the ordinary airplane except that it has no motive power and relies for flight upon gravity and the effect of prevailing wing currents. It was these glider tests which gave the Wright Brothers the idea of using an engine to give a machine power to fly.

DR. SAMUEL P. LANGLEY professor of astronomy and mathematics associated with the Smithsonian Institute of Washington D. C. proved with small models the possibility of flying heavier-than-air craft. Studying shape of wings and problems of equilibrium he developed "Aerodrome" models with wing spread of fourteen feet.

On May 6, 1896 his efforts were rewarded by two flights over the Potomac River, one of the flights covering a distance of more than one half mile. In 1903, after Langley had wrecked two planes which the government had financed for him. He saw he could not continue his experiments because of lack of money. From this time on the airplane was developed rapidly.

AT Kitty Hawk, North Carolina, on December 17th, 1903, the cry went out, "they've done it, they've flown like birds." They had actually seen men fly, the first time it had been done without artificial aids. The Wright Brothers had designed a model in which they installed a 16 horse power four cylinder engine. The flight lasted 59 seconds and covered a distance of 859 feet.

The course of the flight was up and down due to the lack of experience in handling the machine. The machine would rise suddenly to about 10 feet and then as suddenly dart for the ground. Though they stayed up less than one minute the Wright Brothers proved to the world that a machine could be made to fly.

IT was about this time that Alexander Graham Bell, inventor of the telephone, began his experiments on flying kites. In 1907 he attracted wide-spread attention when with a man-carrying kite he attained a height of 175 feet near Bullock, Nova Scotia.

Bell's experiments were based on his tetrahedral principle, which was that the weight of aircraft should not increase in any greater proportion than the lifting power, when the size was increased. With his big kite "Cygnets" he proved his theory.

Bell founded the Aerial Experiment Association at Hammondsport, N. Y., which became an important factor in the development of aviation.

BY this time Elmer Ambrose Sperry, founder and builder of arc lights, electric trolley cars and electric automobiles had turned his attention to the gyroscope, one of the important inventions in the advancement of aviation. He skillfully combined electrical and mechanical elements into successful gyroscopic compasses and stabilizers for ships and airplanes.

THE "robot pilot" in use today, which is an advance of Sperry's device consists of two enclosed gyroscopes, one set vertically and controlling the rudder; the other set horizontally and controlling the wings and ailerons.

Should the ship turn off its course, dip, rise or slip sideways, the gyroscopes establish contact with an electric motor, which operates the rudder or ailerons to right the plane.

Wiley Post, in 1933, used a "robot pilot" in his eight-day solo flight around the world.

To the Wright Brothers, DuVinci, Lilienthal, Langley, Sperry, Bell and all the other pioneers of aviation, "Amazing Men" all, must go the credit for the plane of today.
